

13-Jan-2021_good actors move to the next scene

(Jesus speaking:) Baby, I've just gotta take off yet a few more layers, because unless I do, you won't feel the spirit of God quite as strongly. And this will be needed for the coming days. Lay down your hopes of being who you hope to be in the final days, your visions of what you think would bring My plan to pass in a cool way. You are still holding on to fragments of dreams.

It's time for everything to go. Because as long as you have any hopes of doing this or that, these thoughts cloud your vision and throw off your judgement to make wise, purely God-centered decisions. It's like having coloured glasses on. It makes you look at things in the light of getting this or that hope fulfilled. Decisions based on your inner thoughts and hopes won't be 100% according to My highest will, with no strings attached.

Imagine it this way: I tell you to go and select the blue one, yet because of your pink shades on, you can't see things right.

I can see into your mind, and any thoughts at all that you entertain that have anything to do with or are involving you and your future—anything that is not about today's mission, has to go.

Remember that freedom vision? Please, stop painting yet more murals, because when I bring about the real events in your life, it will be unnecessarily painful for you to see your hopes getting torn away. Whereas if you hadn't put up that false image of hope-for--that mirage that was never to be--then the future might even be exciting. And I want it to be.

The enemy can use the images in your mind to make things painful for you. He might feed you on in an idea, and then when I work differently with you—the way I always had planned for since the beginning—then the enemy can cut you with it and say "See, the Lord you serve just smashed your dreams. Is it worth all this pain?"

But darling, I didn't want you to get attached to those false hope ideas. I wanted you to move with Me, alive and fresh, every living day of your life.

Things won't continue as they have been, endlessly, for however long your fantasies wish for, because it literally is costing a whole lot of bloodshed and loss of lives to maintain the world system the way it is revolving around you there. The devil uses his own people to fuel his own machine. But that's going to stop.

So to make things easier on us both, any thought or image that paints itself in your mind that isn't about today, or something I haven't told you to plan for in the future, goes. Will you always have with you all members of your family? Will you always have perfect health? Will you even still be here? Will you have all your material things? All these things are fluid. They are as props and settings in the stage of your life.

The thing that matters most is, are you saying your lines right and playing your part? And then when I call for a scene change, are you too attached to the last role you played, so you sit there rather dazed, and aren't quick enough to hop up and play the next part of the story?

Don't get attached to things. Don't get attached to activities. Don't get attached to people, or your job, or your abilities, or the things that are making you feel happy now. They are part of the scenery; they can, and most likely will change as the next part of the script is played out.

Be a good actor or actress that doesn't need to be prompted repeatedly that it's now the next part. Be ready to move on, and to play whatever role is next in the plan for you. And if a few things surprise you, things that you aren't sure are meant to be part of the script, just roll with it, and keep going. That's life. Surprises come to all. Be brave. There'll be refreshments aplenty when the play is finished.