

7-Jan-2021_action shows true knowledge

(Spirit helper speaking: ) Delight yourself in the Lord. He knows just what you need, and will only give that which will bring delight to your soul—in that time when all the cards are laid down, and you see it all. Jesus knows you all are going to have a whole lot of questions, and so He only does that which is right, as He will have to answer all those questions from all humanity.

It's not like the story of Earth, and even just what you personally went through, will all unfold instantaneously the moment you get "home" and it all will make perfect sense. Some things will be unwrapped and explained over time, through the experiences you are allowed to enjoy, or information you are privy to. Also, the story isn't yet over. There's a whole new chapter yet to be written. The story will take more shape once that chapter is lived out.

But since some information can only be granted to people as they are allowed to know, or able to manage, not everything can be thrown in your lap the moment you want to know why this or that thing happened. Just think of all the sagas that are still going on today, do those in Heaven know all the whys, and have full knowledge? They have faith, but they can't see everything about the future yet. So many stories have yet to be lived out, and once lived out, then the full explanation can come.

Have you ever had something you wanted to tell someone, but you couldn't, because it would mean a secret would leak out with it as well? Something they weren't ready to hear about? That can be what it's like here at times. Unless you are privy to different aspects of the Heavenly realm, some things just won't make sense if you hear about them, or it might be information that will give more questions than it will answer, and it might not be the time for it right then.

You've had that happen to you there. You get some neat message in prophecy, say from a saint up in Heaven, and you'd like to share something from it, but those there won't receive it, as they don't have faith in hearing Jesus' words as spoken through an angel or saint. So you just have to shut your mouth and keep the secret. The information might have given them the faith to keep on going, or give them something inspiring to think about, but because it lets "the cat out of the bag" in some other way (informs them of something they aren't to know about now) you just can't pass it on yet.

But don't worry. We are all progressing and working towards being more like Jesus. There are tons of things I'm not allowed to say yet either, no matter how eager and "open minded" you think you are. It's just not the Lord's time yet.

But knowing things, or knowing all, isn't really the goal of life. If you think that, then you might get tripped up in a trap, like Eve, who wanted to know more, but didn't want to follow the simple instruction that she was already given.

You are here to learn. Now "learn" you automatically think of as "knowing more". But some lessons are more down to Earth—pardon the pun—and you have to be actually doing something in the physical in order to "learn it". So just knowing things, or knowing more and more of the mind of Jesus isn't all that He wants. He loves for your love, yes, and how is that best shown? He wants to see you in action, actually doing His will. Doing something with the knowledge that He has blessed and entrusted you with.

Even if all you have learned is a single Bible verse, and have no access to more, yet you obey it, the Lord will be pleased and will certainly teach you new things. But you have to start with faith-filled obedience.

Learning and doing go together, for that is the best way most people learn. Take Earth life for example. Why Earth? To learn, yes, and to do! To do what? To do the Master's will, even if it's the toughest thing you do, and the last thing you do. To do it. That proves to Him that you have learned a lesson, even sealing it with your blood. You prove your knowledge of a fact He teaches you through doing something about it. How else do you know someone knows something? By the actions they take, of course.

Why couldn't Jesus just do the whole crucifixion by remote, in mouth only, "Yes I would give My life—if I was there; in theory I am on the cross; My heart is there with you". Is that what He did? No. He actually "learned obedience through the things He which He suffered" that is to say through doing and living, and going literally through hell to show it. He knew His Father's will and lived it out, every drop of blood it took, one moment at a time. He proved His knowledge of His Father's will through the action He took. And so must you.
