(Spirit helper speaking:) See that bridge over there, that one semi in the clouds, and over a very vast and steep ravine? That's where we're going. It's a time saving bridge. You could do the very long trek down one mountain and up again on the other side. But time is ticking too fast for that right now.

So speed is of essence.

It will take a lot of faith to go there, but it will sure save you a lot of bumps and scratches, and risk you just not having the umph to climb all the way up again.

You know what that bridge is? "Forsaking your own will."

So, you can reach the next mountain top the fast way or the long way. The long way goes all the way down one mountain side up and all the way up the next. This is the way that shows you that you shouldn't have taken that road or made that choice. Though at first when choosing which way to take, a down hill path does at first look rather inviting. Yet, it gets very steep real fast, and then gets mighty dangerous.

The way down and up is the "He gave them their requests but sent leanness to their soul" road. He could give you what you want, but then teach you hard lessons through it. You'll be strong and wiser and more yielded at the end for all the tests—if you make it out the other side and up to the top again.

But is there time for that right now? Not if you want to reach the next summit before sundown. Is the goal to tick all the boxes in your life of all the things you wish to get done while on Earth? Or to reach as many of My goals as possible?

Maybe sometime in the past there was time for both. But I think we'll just skip some of those "nice to do" and "good to learn" and "important to experience" things, and maybe a bit of fun too, and just take the speedy road to the goal. It's time for shortcuts. At least you are still alive and still have a chance to learn and do a few more things. But let's make this brief and swift and take the next exit that leads to the bridge.

Oh, you thought it was solid and stable one? And now you see it's suspended and swinging and the wind is blowing especially hard this high up. Yes, you'll need to hold on real tight and take things one step at a time. But I'll be with you and instruct you and prod you to keep taking one more step until we reach the other side beyond the clouds.

I love you and won't leave your side.
